

The Judges of England, Vol. 3: With Sketches of Their Lives, and Miscellaneous Notices Connected With the Courts at Westminster (Classic Reprint)

Excerpt from The Judges of England, Vol. 3: With Sketches of Their Lives, and Miscellaneous Notices Connected With the Courts at Westminster While these pages have been passing through the press, I have had to join in lamenting the loss of the esteemed nobleman who permitted this work to be dedicated to him. By the death of Lord Langdale I have been deprived of the warmest encourager of my literary enterprise, of the ablest assistant in my laborious investigations, - of one who the first to dispel the diffidence of success which I unaffectedly felt, and was ever ready to procure for me the materials by which that success might be ensured, - of one whose cordiality and kindness made it a pleasure to apply to him in cases of difficulty, while the readiness with which he cast aside the dignity of his position gave an additional value to his communications. I cannot expect again to meet with a patron for whom I can feel so much affection, mingled with respect, nor in whom I can hope to find the will joined with so much power to serve inc. To the public his Lordships loss will not be easily supplied. Independently of the performance of his judicial duties, of which this is not the place to speak, no man was so peculiarly fitted for the great undertaking which has made such advances during the period of his official career.
